I would emphasize the provisional clause in this part of my thesis, biologically speaking--that is, naturally, in the naive individual, for we shall suggest below that it loses this unpleasantness as the person becomes a psychologic personality. We all know that freedom as such is pleasant, and a seven-foot shelf of books, or one even longer, might be readily written, given time, to extol freedom s pleasures in every possible realm of human experience. It has, I think, not been often effectively suggested, on the other hand, that in the unsophisticated animal, dog, or child, or savage, inhibition is essentially and inherently unpleasant (until, by submersion--see below--its disagreeableness has been mostly lost). It seems to suffice for our present concern in clothes-physiology to point out that the inhibition of impulsive tendencies (mostly pleasant on well-accepted principles) is by their very nature usually an unpleasant process.
